THE SMALL THINGS OF A DAY. MRS. ROGERS'S STRANGESTORY. Claiming to Be Mr. Randall's Nieve-Which He Denles,

Miss Jennie E. Moore is president of the Mizpah Association of the Blind in Brooklyn. She became interested in a family by meeting three poverty stricken children on Mispan Association of the Blind in Brooklyn. She became interested in a family by meeting three poverty-stricken children on the sidewalk. Upon inquiry she learned that they were the children of a Mrs. G. W. Rogers, who lived on the top floor and who told a pitiful story.

"I was born." she said, "on the corner of Chestnut and Eighth streets, Philadelphis, in 1850. My father, George Conkling, was a representative in Congress in that year and the one following, and I remained in Washington mixing with the best society until I was sent to St. Mary's Seminary in Newark, N. J. While there i met with my first husband, whose name was Donovan. He died of heart disease, leaving me with five children, the last two being twins. Then my real troubles commenced, but after awhile the Young Women's Christian Society of New York obtained employment for me at Staten Island. I did not stay long there and finally married my present husband, who is a coach painter. Of course my relatives in Washlogton and Philadelphia gave me the coldshoulder for marrying a man whom they said was beneath me, but I did not care what they thought, because I loved Mr. Donovan, and have never bothered my friends since."

Further investigation was male of the case. It was ascertained that there have only been three Conklings to the congressional directory. Roseoe is one of the three, but George Conkling does not appear in that book of reference as from Pennaylvania, or anywhere else, in 1850-1851, or at any other time. Miss Moore was made acquainted with this fact, and she called again on Mrs. Rogers, who persisted in saying she was the daughter of ex Congressman Geo. Conkling, of Pennsylvania, and that her mother was a sister of Samuel J. Randsill, ex-speaker of the House of Representatives. Mr. Randall was written to and the correspondent called upon Mrs. Rogers at 165 Fourth avenue. He met a black-eyed and black-haired woman of about 37 years of age, who still shows signs of former beauty. When told that her visitor was a fr

Washington, the lady seemed rejoiced to see the stranger, and instantly volunteered the statement that she was the niece of the illustrious statesman.

"How many nieces did your Uncle Samuel have?" asked the correspondent.

"He had two, one of whom married as man named Stanley, and the other, Kate, became my mother, who died, and father them married again. I have a son the living image of Uncle Randall. I lived in Washington when Pierce and Buchanan were Presidents and remember both of them very well. After my father retired from congressional life he held many offices under the Presidents named."

"Did your uncle have any more sisters?"

"Oh, yes; he had a number of foster sisters whom I used to call aunties."

"Do you remember the namea?"

"I do not. You see I was so young then, and it is so long ago that my memory falls me in that direction."

"How do you get along nows?"

"How do you get along nows?"

"How do you get along nows! as kind man, who is very good to my former husband's children. He is earning good wages now, but while he was out of work we had a tempestuous time, but I am perfectly satisfied and have no desire to return to the city of my birth or look again on the faces of my wealthy and intellectual relations. I do not think that Sam Randall has any money, for he was always looked upon as an honest politician, and he has a large family to look after."

Mrs. Rogers did not appear to be a crink, and it is safe to say that her story would be believed by nine out of every ten persons who listened to it. Nevertheless, Mr. Randall, in response to the letter addressed to him, replied as follows:

Washington, D. C., Mar. 23, 1857.—My Dran Sm. Yours received. I do not know Mrs. George Rogers. Her mother was not my sister. I had but one sister who grew into year, Mrs. Samuel Williams, who let thee children, all of whom survive her, are married and have in life.

Gen. George Sheridan on Bob Ingersoll. It is prediction pretty sure to be verified to say that the Congregational Church will be packed with people on next Wednesday be packed with people on next Wednesday night. The gerial and jolly Gen. George A. Sheridan is to lecture, and has selected for his subject "The Modern Pagan." This is understood to be Col. Bob Ingersoll. This will be like the battle batween the ginuts. Both are equally matched in the power of ridicule, sarcasm, wit, pathos, and eloquence, and both well known the public. Gen. Sheridan proposes to attack Col. Bob's manner of handling and discussing religious subjects, and promises to point out a number of fineonistencies on the part of the iconoclast. He is an easy, fluent speaker, possessing a good voice, and Gen. Sheridan never fails to carry with him the interest and never fails to carry with him the interest and attention of his audience.
